

Dr. Jallicia Jolly is a writer and reproductive justice organizer who is an Assistant Professor in American Studies and Black Studies at Amherst College. She is currently a Visiting Scholar at Princeton University's Effron Center for the Study of America. A 2025 National Academy of Sciences U.S. Kavli Fellow, she merges community-based research on Black women's health, grassroots activism, and transnational political leadership with reproductive justice organizing and practice in the United States and the Caribbean. Dr. Jolly is the founder and director of the Black Feminist Reproductive Justice, Equity, and HIV/AIDS Activism (BREHA) Collective—an interdisciplinary, medical humanities lab that bridges research, advocacy, student collaborations, and high-impact learning experiences on the health and movement-building of Afro-diasporic girls, women, and gender diverse people. Her first book manuscript, Ill Erotics: Black Caribbean Women and Self-Making in the Time of HIV/AIDS (University of California Press, Forthcoming 2026). Dr. Jolly has written for Forbes, The Washington Post, Ms. Magazine, USA Today, and Huffington Post. Her work has also been awarded recognition and supported by grants/fellowships such as The Ford Foundation, Fulbright Scholar Program, The Mellon Mays Foundation, National Women's Studies Association, Yale University's Center for Interdisciplinary Research on AIDS (CIRA), and Brown University's Pembroke Center for Teaching and Research on Women. Dr. Jolly earned her B. A. at Williams College in 2014, and her Masters and Ph.D. in American Studies at the University of Michigan, in 2016 and then 2020. She leads with justice and joy as her core intention.
