

James Frater is a doctor with an MPH in Health Policy & Management from Harvard. He is dedicated to creating healthcare systems that deliver care closer to where people live, work, and feel most comfortable.

In addition to his formal training, he has engaged with international policy making as the UK G20 Youth Delegate for Health, Wellbeing & Sport. He has also co-authored a book chapter on improving health in the Caribbean with the Professor David Williams and was part of a national team that wrote a playbook for health state departments in US that helps them tackle homelessness as a public health challenge.

At Yale, he currently uses his education, experience and expertise to lead work on the relationship between substance misuse and social connectedness, as well as managing the SOCAH (Society, Connectedness and Health) group work on HIV and the social determinants of health.
