

Tyrone Beason is a staff writer for the Los Angeles Times' environment, climate, health and science team, where he has written about the indigenous LandBack movement, environmental injustice, legacies of displacement and the ways that Californians, especially residents of color, relate to their natural and built environments. He has also examined the roles of race, identity, nationalism and demographic change in America's politics. After the 2020 U.S. presidential election, he set out on a personal journey across the country in search of a meaningful racial reckoning for his award-winning print and video series "My Country." Beason previously worked at The Seattle Times, where he was a social justice columnist, Sunday magazine writer, cultural critic, and features, business and public affairs reporter. During his year as a fellow at Harvard's Nieman Foundation for Journalism, Tyrone is exploring how humans find belonging, wrestle with historical wrongs and chart more hopeful futures.

LinkedIn: <https://www.linkedin.com/in/tyrone-beason/>